

March 2008

I Fell in Love that Day

Gerald Brett Narmore
American Public University System

Follow this and additional works at: <http://digitalcommons.apus.edu/theapuseagle>

 Part of the Poetry Commons

Recommended Citation

Narmore, Gerald Brett (2008) "I Fell in Love that Day," The APUS Eagle: Vol. 1: Iss. 1, Article 5.
Available at: <http://digitalcommons.apus.edu/theapuseagle/vol1/iss1/5>

This Article is brought to you for free and open access by the ePress Journals at DigitalCommons@APUS. It has been accepted for inclusion in The APUS Eagle by an authorized administrator of DigitalCommons@APUS. For more information, please contact digitalcommons@apus.edu.

I Fell in Love that Day

By Gerald Brett Narmore

I fell in love the day you came
 Into a sire's wanting world,
 Although you were none too pleas'd
 To leave that place where bonds were forg'd
 So long with Eve; you told it so:
 Howling with raucous rage, venting
 Displeasure for frigid, foraging
 Hands that prodded for safety's sake.
 The wind in your bellows screeched
 Over tremulous cords until I
 Said "Isaiah," and all was then
 Well with you. No, we had never Met, but you knew me still, for you
 Searched my face with knowing
 Eyes. I fell in love that day

About Gerald Brett Narmore

Gerald Narmore is an undergraduate English major at American Military University. He developed a passion for poetry while taking British Poetry as a student of Professor Everett Corum. Although Gerald sometimes struggles with "strained" end-rhymes, he is ardently pursuing improvement as a poet.

His interest include: reading, writing, history, and the insane brutality of CrossFit.

Originally from North Alabama, Gerald now lives in Akron, Ohio with his wife, Joy, and two sons, Isaiah and Ben.

